Some of my oldest memories are sounds. The way rain hit the tin roof of my grandparents' house. The low hum of the refrigerator in the kitchen at night. My mother's voice calling me in for dinner from three streets away. I think about these things a lot, partly because I don't remember much else clearly, and partly because I've been trying to write a piece of music that feels like those memories sound.
That's harder than it sounds. Memory is not a recording. It's a reconstruction, and every time you revisit a memory you change it a little more. By the time you've written it down, you're not remembering the original anymore. You're remembering your last attempt to remember it.
I've been working on this piece for almost a year now, and I still don't know if I'm close.
Some days I think I've captured the feeling of standing in the doorway waiting for my father to come home from his shift, and other days I think I've just written a boring piano piece with a few pretty chords in it. The honest answer is probably somewhere in between, but I'm not sure I'm the best judge. I've asked a few friends to listen and tell me what they hear, and I've learned that what I intended and what they experience are surprisingly far apart. A passage I thought was tense and anxious, they described as peaceful. A section I meant to be hopeful, someone said made them sad. I'm not sure what to do with that yet.
Maybe it means the piece is working in ways I can't control, which is either the point of art or a sign that I should have practiced more.
